Research and teaching must go hand in hand. The knowledge generated from educational research will undoubtedly shape education policy and become innovative practices in the classrooms. I am very excited to participate in this APERA Conference 2006 where educators from around the world are here in Hong Kong to share with us your research results that will impact all aspects of education in this globalized world. I am sure your innovation will find itself to greatly benefit student learning.

I would like to congratulate the conference organizers and sponsors for a successful and important event. I wish you a pleasant and fruitful conference and I applaud APERA for supporting research in educational development.
